Place & Time: Europe and the World 1550-1800

The seventeenth and eighteenth centuries witnessed the Scientific Revolution and the Enlightenment. Philosophers and scientists produced new theories about the structure of the universe and humankind's relationship to it. As European powers explored the world and expanded their colonial empires, conflicts erupted. This first age of global warfare culminated in the Seven Years' War, fought in Europe, North America, and India.

DBQ

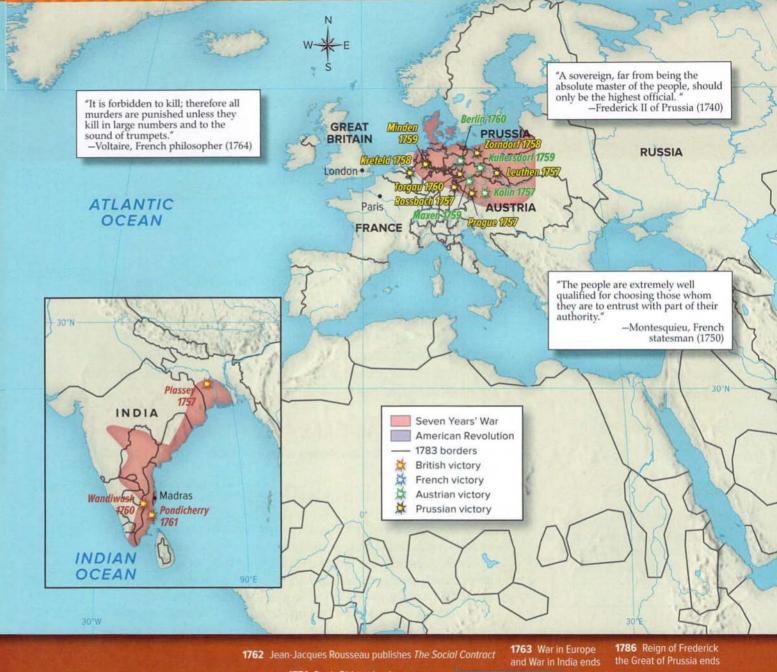

Analyzing Historical Documents How would you generalize the attitude of the Enlightenment toward a conflict between colonial empires, such as the Seven Years' War? Reference specific primary sources in your answer.

PRIMARY SOURCE

"Though... politics [cannot] be founded on any thing but the consent of the people... in the noise of war, which makes so great a part of the history of mankind, this consent is little taken notice of: and therefore many have mistaken the force of arms for the consent of the people, and reckon conquest as one of the originals of government. But conquest is as far from setting up any government, as demolishing an [sic] house is from building a new one in the place.... Without the consent of the people, [one] can never erect a new one."

-John Locke, from Two Treatises of Government, 1690
